HOW VOLAPUK SOUNDS.

Opinions of a Listener at the Recent Convention in Boston. The convention opened with an address in volupuk by the president of the association, Col. Charles E. Sprague, of New York. Of course his address was received attentively, but it cannot be said that he was speaking to people in their own language. His listeners doubtless understood part of his remarks, for he was applauded two or three times, but to the majority of the people it was evident that understanding came only with difficulty. Now, how did the new invention sound? Well, there was a great predominance of the European a and i (or ee) and of the long 6. In every sentence caulsone of these vowels seemed to outnumber all the others put together. Consonants were obscure as Col. Sprague spoke them, and it was noticeable that the sibillant s was very frequent. The letter 1 also seemed to be a hard worked member of the volapuk alphabet. From the prominence of these few vowels and consonants and from the obscurity of other consonants one can get her part to contribute to the interest of the work. A remarkable degree of spirit-pronunciation follows the French in pronunciation follows the French in having no accent. That is, Col. Sprague talked with just about the same stress on each syllable, and I paid close attention to this feature of the flow of sound after noticing it. Lacking accent, volapuk lacks the force which is so strong a and German are the result of genius and struggle, of wars and disputes, of orations and poems, of business sharpness and philosophical contemplation. are alive. He was wonderfully proficient, and is to be praised highly for his ability to talk in that which has no dialect and no every day vocabulary, and so is above the usual perils to translators. In a book translated into English from German by a Dutchman who had to learn both the former languages I have seen the most curious mistakes and odd combinations. vet not in violation of rules given in the books. But there was no one to criticise the colonel, who was born and bred a Volapuk. He was not perfect, however. He would go wrong sometimes, and then step back for a fresh start, like a boot bumping up to a fleat bow on, and then rebounding for a second approach. But he got through very creditably. A delegate from the floor said something in Volapuk in a labored way and | the streets of Mayville, N. Y., a remarksoon struck into English. Lay Your Foundation First,

Here comes a youngster with the ques tion, "How shall I get into vegetable gardening?" Well, it is a very simple thing. How would you begin to build a and raised a broad of chickens since the smoke house? Why, of course, begin at the bottom. All right. So it is with a The St. Louis Missouri Pacific train garden; you must begin at the bottom. Now the bottom of a garden is never less than one foot below the surface, and from that depth up to the top the soil must be at least one-quarter manure to begin with, and must be kept up by yearly renewals to that proportion you have got a multiplication table, a slate and pencil and a good, sound head on your shoulders (you will want all these in growing vegetables) you can soon find out how much manure it will take to lay the foundation. Mix in all through that foot of depth, and then you can build any kind of a crop on your land you choose. Lay your foundation young man, and we will tell you how to put up the structure afterward. - Germantown Telegraph.
